

Smithsonian Institution- National Museum of African American History and Culture

Associate Director for External Affairs

The newest addition to the Smithsonian Institution, the National Museum of African American History and Culture (NMAAHC) is the national museum for the study and exposition of the African American experience. Interactive exhibits will guide museum visitors through a dialogue about race, foster a spirit of healing and reconciliation and help explore American identity in an increasingly global world.

The Associate Director for External Affairs is the Chief Development and Communications Officer of the NMAAHC. In other organizations this position would be the Vice President for Development, Deputy Director of External Affairs or Chief Development and Communications Officer. Reporting to the Museum Director, s/he will direct and lead all aspects of the development and public affairs activities for the museum. The Associate Director is a key member of the Museum Director's senior leadership team. This position is based in Washington, D.C. and the successful individual will lead a major capital campaign to construct a museum home on the National Mall. Construction of the NMAAHC is set to begin in 2012, and open in 2015.
